"Estar siendo. Bajo una bandera ajena"

For four years, the Argentine artist José Luis Landet has served as archon for the files of the painter Carlos Gómez. The role of the archon is double: the custody of the space that beholds the documents and the interpretation to provide meaning to such documents. Throughout these four years, Landet undertook the classification of paintings, mail, logbooks and diaries of the late Gómez. On complying with the hermeneutic role, the artist has manipulated, imagined and developed unfinished projects. By the time of the first exhibition, the link between author and authority was indistinguishable.

From a certain point of view, an archive is something that can never be fully consumed. It is a mass of documents capable of providing all the terms for elaborating several discourses. In a way, the work of the late Gómez could keep on composing itself and producing narratives, granting autonomy to its archon. Such autonomy given to Landet, after four years of constant work, has several effects in his own production; the most remarkable ones are the images produced for some of Gómez' unfinished projects, in which Landet appropriates them to reflect about aesthetical issues on contemporaneity. Just as the archives produce their own discourses through random chaining of documents, current media are the machinery that automatically generates political images. Hence, the threatening aesthetization of politics is inescapable and the production of political art seems then to loose sense. In this sense, Landet deliberately decides to produce an iconoclastic act: destroying the flags of the American countries, leaving only their edges, subtracting their national emblems and dipping them in blank paint, similarly to what Gómez did while looking for aphorisms within the pages of Lenin's books. This sacrifice of flags is a provocative dismantling that aims towards a new grammar of national symbols, reporting the painful failure of a desired "Greater Fatherland" that should unite ideologically the American continent from 1970 up until the first decades of the 21st century.

The act of devastating, hollowing out and rearticulating the grammar of political symbols performed by José Luis Landet appears to be suggested by the marginal aspects that deeply interested his mentor. In this case, by the heading of a Lenin's text 'Bajo una bandera ajena' (Under a foreign flag), that Gómez himself ripped off from a volume of complete works, the same one from which this works arises, as an open and suggested instruction.
